The cat courtroom was crowded to its capacity as the cat jury filed in to give their verdict in a cat case that had become famous for its long duration. "Twas a riot in which Ben Quarrelson, a tramp cat was endeavouring to collect damages from Col. Millionaire's, whose cook had severely mauled said Tramp Cat with a pail of hot water as he begged for some cooked bacon at the said Col. Millionaire's kitchen door.

"Well, what's your verdict, gentlemen," asked the judge-cat from his elevated perch.

"Your honor," answered the foreman, "we, the cat jury return a verdict for the plaintiff to the tune of 20s. cat sterling, the cause representing the quarrel taking he the actual cat fee lost by said plaintiff. The said cat for being the fur of a tramp cat, forced us to render an award of damages, as Tramp cat fur is not quoted on the local Cat Fur Exchange at a great reduction in price.

And so the famous cat case ended with all well satisfied except plaintiff Tramp Cat, who insisted that although a tramp cat, he was quite good cat stock, and his fur was as fine as any cat's fur going. He filed notice of appeal immediately.
